A: Looking at the current version of the guidelines, it seems you need to give up the idea of an overarching "standard set of procedures" as a guide for what to do as far as the clinical microbiome is concerned. Instead, you need to tailor your answers to the patient. It will typically include some aspects of this flow chart (when appropriate). The main consideration should be that the sample will be used to assess the overall balance of bacterial load, i.e., the "state of the microbiome" by determining if it is dysbiotic (i.e., too "pathogenic") relative to the patient's best state. This can be done using reference based algorithms (i.e., that use reference data) or with artificial intelligence that uses reference data in combination with a patient-specific "thermodynamic signature" (i.e., an analysis of the patient's symptoms). What is typically done, to monitor the balance, is to collect a baseline sample, where the patient is deemed to be healthy, and then collect multiple samples over time during the course of treatment in order to monitor changes. The pathological diagnosis was thymoma, mostly type A. A few months after thymectomy, he had a nodule in his penis and the lesion was found to be composed of anaplastic carcinoma cells on histopathological examination.
